Training Methodology

This course uses a variety of adult learning methods to aid full understanding. Participants will view presentations to discover the benefits of a sustainable business model that covers corporate social responsibility. They will take part in practical exercises and quizzes to develop action plans to aid their local community best while removing areas of risk and increasing profits.

The participants will undertake a negotiation and pitching role-play exercise to demonstrate how their organisation fulfils its CSR and discuss future-proofed planning models for developing their business.

Summary

Businesses in the past focused their values and company goals solely on developing their own economic gain and delivering a good return on investment to grow. However, as times have changed, many stakeholders, benefactors, or funding resources expect businesses to not only provide that same return that they used to but also benefit other people, places, or community functions to be eligible for investment.

While this may seem like a tall order, considering your corporate social responsibility and factoring this into future strategic planning can give your company a better position on the investment ladder and make potential clients and customers use your service over others purely due to its benefits for the wider community. For this reason, CSR actually goes hand in hand with growing profits, benefiting everyone.

However, exploring CSR and pitching this to potential stakeholders can be challenging for some businesses. Creating a focus on sustainability and community development and growing your return on investment opportunities requires careful consideration and a sound implementation procedure to future-proof the business and gain buy-in from external funders and internal employees.
