Summary

Keeping your composure is an incredibly useful skill to perfect. During each working day, no matter what industry you're in, you or your employees will come up against challenges that require problem-solving skills, future thinking and, above all, the right mindset and etiquette to be a positive influence and role model. The key to gaining the respect of your peers and colleagues is to remain composed during any form of pressure or conflict and control your own emotions to ensure the best outcome for the business.

As a manager, any mismanagement of emotions in front of your co-workers could reflect badly on you and your company, especially if you are responsible for dealing with external relationships. No business can be successful with leaders who can't control their emotions when necessary.

Learning to properly display your emotions and communicate effectively will help you motivate your team, gain trust and buy-in from clients and consumers, and understand where the problems are so that you can make changes and future-proof your business.
