- HR Professionals
- Recruitment Consultants
- Job Description Creators
 - Recruiters
- Business Owners
 - Directors
- HR Partners

Training Methodology

This course uses various adult learning techniques to aid full understanding and comprehension. Participants will review several complex job descriptions and use group discussions and role-playing activities to determine the best types of candidates for the role.

They will view presentations and participate in practical group activities to develop questioning and negotiation skills and create an interview process that suits a senior job role within their organisation using a variety of methods that they have practised.

Summary

When people think of nerve-racking interviews, they often imagine the interviewee under pressure. However, the interviewer is equally stressed, especially in senior roles.

Choosing the right candidate is crucial for business success. You need someone who brings fresh ideas, manages communication effectively, builds relationships, and continuously improves the department. A wrong choice can strain resources and be financially burdensome if re-hiring and retraining are needed.

The interviewer must ask the right questions, evaluate responses, body language, and personality, and sell the job role. Senior candidates, being experienced and selective, pressure the interviewer to present the company well.

Interviewers must study the job description, determine the ideal candidate profile, and ensure the candidate fits the workplace culture. Using various questioning techniques and communication styles is essential to make the right choice.
